Straight from the counter and no chance of change came the pleas of the girls who worked in shops. They told how their Saturday off in the summer is "just a silly bluff," since they had to work late on Thursday night and "later-sometimes till eleven"—on Friday to receive it. "But it makes the boss feel he's being kind to us."

Girl Hates Christmas

"Gee, how I hate Christmas!" a brown-eyed girl said, taking the platform. "I hate it more than any day on the calendar. I begin thinking at Thanksgiving how I hate it."

She gave her schedule of the entire week of overwork just before Christmas last year. On one occasion she had worked from 8 o'clock in the morning till I o'clock the next morning, with twenty minutes off twice during the day for meals. She had to go without one of these, however, because "there was no place near enough where look get anything cheap enough."

They hadn't anything very complimentary to say about legislation. They would like to get their eight-hour day themselves, through their unions and organizations, because then "we'd know we had it."

If the Legislature merely passed an agreement to live apart. Incompatibility of temperament was given as the cause.
